When the foot or leg hits the protrusion, there is a tendency to begin running at a greater than normal rate of speed and increasing momentum, which can be arrested by continuing to run, twisting the foot or leg to change direction, or sometimes even continuing to run. Further, should the distance between the protrusion and the point of impact be great, the momentum of the runner may be so great as to carry the runner over the protrusion. It is also common for a runner, tripped over an 50b96ab0b6
